The Ethnic Studies department will host the seventh annual undergraduate colloquium. This year, students from across the University will share their critical research on issues of militarization, immigration, sexuality, indigenous health and decolonization. Though the topics are diverse, each of these papers assumes the mutual constitution of government policy and culture. That is, speakers will show how ideology motivates policy across the U.S. and how Native Hawaiians might turn to traditional ways-of-being to affect societal change in Hawai‘i.
